In 1925 Australia's Census declared Aboriginal people a 'dying race'. The Australian Museum commissioned three statues of 'full blood' Aboriginal people: a child, a man and a woman, exhibited as nameless objects to be studied. The woman was Nellie Walker, Irene Walker's great grandmother and director Daniel King's great, great grandmother.

Now Irene is on a journey to retrace Nellie's life and understand her times. But first she must find the other statue's descendants, tell them of their ancestors' statues. In this way Irene will honour these ancestors.

This is a timely story by one of Australia's most exciting directors; Ngarigo and Awabakal man Daniel King, documenting his mother's search. This is a profound personal window on a national story, with global consequences for colonial museum collections everywhere.

With a career spanning over 50 years, Gulpilil's contribution to the Australian film industry is part of the history of both the Australian cinema and its representation of Indigenous Australians.

Back to top

This is the story of David Gulpilil's journey home after his passing in 2021, back to his birthplace, the centrepiece of which is his Bāpurru ceremony in Marayuwu near the Arafura Swamp and the remote community of Ramingining, Eastern Arnhem Land in the Northern Territory of Australia.

This is a rare insight into a powerful ceremony of renewal and regeneration and is told completely from the Yolŋu perspective, from the perspective of his family. This remarkable event, marking Gulpilil's return to the earth, the completion of his life cycle, draws a direct line between the contemporary world of international fame and 60,000 years of Indigenous culture.
